Oct. 1st	96	8vo.	First	500	ditto	0 12 0	Bakshinaharan Chatterji, of Pirahati.	The work commences with a dialogue between two of the principal actors in the case of the Gaikwar of Baroda, in which unfavourable comments are made as to the action taken thereon by Government. A little further on, and forming the main part of the book, the insanitary prevailed in the civil jail are contrasted with the heart-rending treatment by the jail authorities of prisoners in the criminal jail. The native doctor is depicted as kind and sympathetic, whilst the Civil Surgeons and the Magistrates are, on the other hand, represented as heartlessly cruel, especially in flogging the prisoners. The drama comprises scenes in the Alipore, Jessore, Burdwan, Nawab, and Baraknore jail. The Jessore jail stands out most prominently in the cruel treatment of its prisoners, one of whom is represented as having died from the effects of the lashes administered to him whilst in prison.

Indra, on being coerced by the demons, lost his throne, and was thereupon advised to seek the aid of one of the mortals, which he accordingly did, and found in Khattánga Rája all that was necessary. On being restored to his throne, Indra ordered great rejoicings, and during one of the nautches one of the celestial dancers became enamoured of Khattánga Rája which so vexed Indra that he cursed and turned her into a mortal for a specified period. During her residence on earth, Kuru Rája, whilst hunting, met and fell in love with her, and after she had, to his intense sorrow, received deliverance and returned to heaven, Kuru by worshipping Indra had her given to him in marriage.
